Plant Societies

Today on Gardening in a Minute: plant societies.

If you have a passion or a curiosity about a certain type of plant, try getting involved with a plant society.

Plant societies are formed by groups of people who share an interest in specific types of plants, including native plants, camellias, bromeliads, orchids, and many others.

The societies keep their members informed about what's new through newsletters and regular meetings. Some seek to promote public interest in these plants, with the goal of expanding research and preservation efforts.

Many also host events that are open to the public, including plant shows and sales. These events can be a great place to see or purchase exciting varieties of plants.

So if you're dizzy about dahlias or cuckoo for camellias, consider joining a plant society!

For more information about plant societies and many other gardening topics, contact your county Extension office or visit Gardening in a Minute dot com.

Gardening in a Minute is a production of the University of Florida's Center for Landscape Conservation and Ecology, IFAS Extension, and WUFT-FM.
